About The Property

Looking for a character home with a strong sense of history, a very handy Newport location, a garage, and a surprisingly good rear garden? Ty Hen is a well-kept semi-detached house close to the Parrog, the coast path and the centre of Newport, offering flexible four-bedroom accommodation in one of the most sought-after parts of Cardigan Bay in West Wales.

Ty Hen, meaning Old House, has an interesting local story behind it. Built in the mid-1800s as one of a pair of cottages for mariners working from Newport Parrog, it reflects the village's past as an important trading and shipbuilding port. Originally known as 2 Ivy Cottages, the house has been renovated and extended over the years, particularly in the 1970s, and has since been kept up to date to suit modern day living while still holding onto that sense of age and character that gives older homes their appeal.

Set right in the heart of Newport, this is a property that suits buyers wanting a proper coastal village base with day-to-day convenience. The Parrog estuary, coast path, shops, places to eat and other local amenities are all close by, making it easy to see why this part of Cardigan Bay remains so consistently popular. For anyone searching in West Wales, Newport tends to hold its appeal for the long term, and this house sits in a particularly handy position within the village.

The ground floor has a practical, comfortable layout. An entrance hallway gives a good first impression, with slate-style flooring running through much of the downstairs and a cloakroom/WC adding useful everyday practicality. The living room is an especially good-sized main reception space, with a bay window to the front and a fireplace creating a natural focal point. It feels like a room that can cope well with family life, while still being a pleasant place to settle into in the evening.

From here, patio doors open through to the sun room at the rear. This is a real asset in my view, as it gives the house another sitting or dining area and creates a strong link with the garden. With glazing and double doors out to the patio, it is a room that would work well across much of the year, whether used for morning coffee, reading, or extra dining space when family and friends are over.

There is also a separate dining room, which helps the house feel more versatile than many village properties of this era. It sits conveniently alongside the kitchen, making it practical for everyday meals as well as more formal use when needed. The kitchen itself is fitted with matching wall and base units and has a straightforward, workable layout with good storage and preparation space. A stable door leads directly out to the rear, which is always useful for garden access, shopping, and general day-to-day living.

Upstairs, the house continues to offer more space than first impressions might suggest. There are three double bedrooms, along with a fourth child's room currently used as a home office, which feels very sensible given how many buyers now want work-from-home flexibility. Even as an office, nursery or dressing room, that extra room adds something valuable to the overall layout.

Another strong point is the presence of two bath/shower rooms on the first floor. That makes the house easier to live in for families, visiting guests, or anyone wanting a bit more flexibility in how the bedrooms are used. It is the sort of feature that can make a real difference in a busy household and is not always easy to find in period village homes.

Outside, the rear garden is a particularly appealing part of the property. Access is available from the sun room, the kitchen, or via the side path, and the layout gives a good balance between seating space and planted areas. There is a patio directly off the house, ideal for outdoor dining or simply sitting out, with steps leading up through the garden beyond. The planting has clearly been cared for, with a mix of shrubs, flower beds and established greenery giving it a mature feel. A feature pond adds another point of interest, and the outlook back towards the house shows just how well the garden complements the accommodation.

The garage is another useful addition, providing parking for one vehicle or valuable storage depending on requirements. There is also an outdoor storage shed with lighting, which is the kind of practical extra that often proves more useful than expected for tools, bikes, garden equipment or coastal gear.

Overall, this is a house with plenty going for it: history, a very good village position, flexible accommodation, useful parking and a garden that feels established and well balanced. For buyers looking at Newport, especially those wanting something with character but without losing everyday practicality, Ty Hen is a strong option and well worth a closer look.
